

Mel Mialon

Mel is a food engineer (MSc in food science and engineering), with training in nutrition and public health (PhD). Mel has a double citizenship, from France and Mauritius. She is currently a postdoc research fellow at the University of Sao Paulo (USP), Brazil, funded by FAPESP (Fundação de Amparo à Pesquisa do Estado de São Paulo). She is conducting a study on the influence of the food industry on public policy and public opinion in Latin America. Prior to joining USP, she spent a year at the University of York, in the UK, where she worked on a project looking at the influence of the alcohol industry on science and policy. She completed my PhD at Deakin University, in Australia. Her research was to develop of a step-by-step approach to identify and monitor the corporate political activity of the food industry at the national level. Since then, the approach has been implemented in about 10 countries around the globe. She is a consultant for various organisations in public health nutrition.
